Let's Dance

The season's best soles don't skimp on groove or glamour. Models Laura Love, Grace Hartzel, and Grace Elizabeth kick up their heels—and show off a few moves—with a cast of professional dancers.

LAURA LOVE

"My mom has all of my old pointe shoes displayed on a wall in my bedroom," says LAURA LOVE, laughing with embarrassment. Her mother, former model Lisa Love, seems like an unlikely childhood shrine maker. The longtime West Coast editor for Vogue and Teen Vogue, Lisa is often spotted at celebrity-packed parties, nonchalantly wearing sunglasses indoors. But mementos are important when your child moves across the country at age 13, as Laura did 10 years ago, to devote herself to ballet at Walnut Hill School for the Arts, a boarding school for the performing arts outside Boston.

"I would do my homework in the splits," Love says. Dance consumed her time until a couple of years ago, when she decided to shift her focus from ballet practices and performances to modeling go-sees and photo shoots. Her lanky body helped, but she attributes her success in both arenas at least partially to her zodiac sign: "I'm a Scorpio, so I'm very determined and competitive."

Add to that the fact that Love's experience in front of the camera started nearly at birth. Her godmother is photographer Pamela Hanson, and she counts Bruce Weber and Mario Testino as close family friends, as well as the late David Armstrong. "I have crazy photo albums," she says. "My life is very well documented."

Cameras trail Love even more now that she has become one of a handful of young faces (along with Dree Hemingway and Atlanta de Cadenet Taylor) who straddle the model and socialite worlds. Whether she's shooting an ad (she has starred in Etro and Bottega Veneta campaigns), sitting front-row (you'll see her at Michael Kors and Dior), walking the runway (from Calvin Klein to Giambattista Valli), or traveling the world for glamorous events (with Gucci and Chanel), it seems clear that her photo-worthy adventures have only just begun. Sarah Bray
